The aim of this research is to establish whether, and to what extent, supplementary materials provided by a digital textbook are effective for foreign language learning. Digital supplementary materials are first analysed a priori using a method developed from the multi-feature hypothesis. Afterwards, two first year classes are involved in the project. Students have to work both on the original exercises provided by their textbook and on an improved version of the worksheets, developed according to the theoretical framework. Students of both classes are then asked to assess the original and the modified worksheets. An online platform is used to manage data collection. The students' feedback is finally compared to the results of the a priori analysis. The outcome shows that most students do not grasp the difference between original and improved materials. Moreover, most of them do not seem to be comfortable with working on digital materials. For these reasons, digital supplementary materials do not have a clear added value for learners. On the other hand, our method for an a priori analysis of the assignments turns out to be quite useful for teachers, who can use the instrument to predict whether an activity is expected to be effective or not beforehand and thus be able to improve it before submitting it to the classes.

Scales describing language proficiency in a series of levels can provide orientation for educational programmes, criteria for assessment, and reporting to stakeholders. However, in most cases such instruments are produced just by expert opinion. A scale of language proficiency actually implies a descriptive scheme related to theory but usable by practitioners. It also implies a methodology for scaling content to different levels. This book describes the use of both qualitative and quantitative techniques to develop scales for the «Common Reference Levels» in the Common European Framework of Reference for modern languages. Short stand-alone descriptors were (i) developed and classified, (ii) refined and elaborated in workshops, and then (iii) scaled by analyzing the judgments of one hundred teachers on the English language proficiency of the learners in their classes.
